Subject: Public Investment in New IP Based Business Startups

My company has been working for the last two years on producing intellectual properties for business startups. We've created a sizeable amount of intellectual properties in patent applications and we are looking for investment and interested entrepreneurs to operate these companies. We have a large scale capacity to create intellectual properties. However, we are not seeing individuals interested in intellectual property based startups. We feel that from a public investment standpoint, that my inventions will represent the top choices for public or private investment. We have seen in the past that Lee County's investments did not create successful businesses that led to long term job creation. We are looking to increase these odds percentages in order to increase the public's interest in continuing to invest in these projects. From my past creation experience, I feel that the odds for public investment are far more likely to become successful using my intellectual properties as opposed to investing in established companies that have a consumer demand satisfied market. New patented intellectual properties properly selected have the highest probability of producing unsatisfied consumer demand that drives products to the top sales categories. My previous conceptions have led the nations in world economic development for some 56 years, although I have never received credit or compensation for these conceptions. If your county or state has interest in becoming a world center for economic prosperity, the answer to accomplishing this is as simple as establishing a relationship with a willingness to invest based on financially viable plans for business developments.

Sincerely,
Michael R. Thomas

P.S. I saw recently on television that you are considering investing in an aircraft manufacturing startup business. I would like to caution you that small airplanes are a competitive long term established business and unless this particular airplane has sufficient innovative features and/or lower production costs than its competitors, it is not likely to do well, especially in today's economic recession environment.
